Many defense contractors (i.e. Lockheed, Boeing, Raytheon) are certified to the ISO 9000 standard. Their banners are proudly posted and/or flown from their corporate headquarters' buildings. Their marketing materials carry the ISO 9000 logo. But what does it mean to the Department of Defense and, more specifically, what does it mean to the program offices and affiliate offices that manage the contracts for the vast number of weapon systems and support services purchased from defense contractors?

Program managers, contracting officers, purchasing/procurement specialist, test and evaluation teams, manufacturing engineers, logistics managers, training systems analysts --- what do you know about the requirements of ISO 9000 and the role it plays in the acquisition process?

Knowledge IS power!

This one-day interactive workshop will introduce participants to the ISO 9000 quality standard and give an overview of its relevance to acquisition program management.

Who Should Attend
